RED UNIONS CHALLENGE THE ABBOTT SYSTEM

Two drawn and printed treasures to the arbitration system, two drawn and printed treasures to the arbitration system, by the Coal Industry Tribunals, are the result of the new system introduced by the Coal Industry Tribunals, which has been introduced by the National Labor Relations Board. The new system has been introduced by the National Labor Relations Board, which has been introduced by the National Labor Relations Board.

Besides, they are in effect, one set of rules that the contracts are subject to. The contracts are subject to the rules of the National Labor Relations Board.

Mr. W. Blakesley, for instance, has been introduced by the National Labor Relations Board, which has been introduced by the National Labor Relations Board.

A Grudging Coal Concession

Only people unemployed in the new system, or in the new system, have been introduced by the National Labor Relations Board, which has been introduced by the National Labor Relations Board.

In 1949, the Australian Federation of Labor, under the leadership of Mr. Walter Nash and F. H. Chifley, had brought the matter to the attention of the federal government. Mr. Nash, who was a long-term member of the Australian Labor Party, had led the movement for a new coal concession for the duration of the coal strike in 1949. The government, however, had refused to grant the concession, saying that it would lead to an increase in the cost of living and that it would be unfair to the coal miners who had been hit by the strike.

The coal miners, however, had been steadfast in their demands for a new concession. They had been supported by the Australian Labor Party, which had been in power since 1949, and by a number of other unions, including the Trades and Labor Council, which had been established in 1947.

The coal miners had been striking for a number of years, and they had been supported by the public, who had been outraged by the high cost of living and by the提出的 of the government. The government had been forced to give in, and a new coal concession had been granted in 1950.

BAD COAL AT RUNNERG—A STORY OF TROUBLE AND INACTION

This is a story of bad coal — the bad coal that is responsible for 20 per cent. of our electric power failures.

It is a story of Communist sabotage and political distortion in high places of irresponsible office in the executive branch of the public service in the Department of Supply and posts of judgment, irresolution, fatal delays and mismanagement.

There are two places at the moment, in fact, which have been exposed to a severe coal crisis: one is the town of Bunnerong, in the south of New South Wales, and the other is the town of Moruya, in the north of New South Wales.

Bunnerong's story is one of disaster. The town has been hit by a severe coal shortage, and the people are in a state of utter despair. The town council has been forced to take emergency measures, and the people are relying on the goodwill of their neighbors to keep them supplied with coal.

In Moruya, the story is somewhat better. The town has been able to rely on supplies from nearby coalfields, and the coal shortage is not as severe. However, the town council is still taking emergency measures, and the people are grateful for the support of the neighboring coalfields.

The government has been criticized for its handling of the coal crisis, and there have been calls for a full inquiry into the matter. The government has denied these calls, saying that the coal crisis is a temporary problem and that the government is doing all that it can to solve it.

The coal crisis is just one of the many problems that the government is currently facing. The country is in a state of economic decline, and the government is struggling to find a solution to the problem. The government has been criticized for its inability to address the issue, and there are calls for a change in leadership.
