Cutting off the ‘fourth arm’ as a political exercise

Tunisia blossoms despite its industrial unrest

From FRANCIS GIHLES, in London

Mr. Bourguiba's decision to withdraw a fourth arm from the country's war against the international community for its Arabism by the decision to withdraw from the United Nations has not affected the country's economic or social development. Although the government has made efforts to attract foreign investment, the country remains economically dependent on oil exports. However, Tunisia's strong cultural identity and its rich heritage have continued to attract tourists and visitors, contributing to the country's economy.

Education

M. Bourguiba has made efforts to improve the education system in Tunisia, including the expansion of higher education institutions and the introduction of new curricula. The government has also increased funding for education, with a focus on improving infrastructure and teacher training. These efforts have resulted in increased access to education for Tunisians, particularly in rural areas.

Chemicals

Tunisia has a significant chemical industry, with a focus on producing basic chemicals such as fertilizer and petrochemicals. The country has taken steps to reduce its carbon footprint by investing in renewable energy sources and improving energy efficiency.

Family

Tunisia has a traditional family structure, with the extended family playing a significant role in daily life. The government has implemented policies to support families, including programs to improve access to healthcare and education.

Dissonance

The government has faced significant opposition to its policies, particularly from opposition parties and civil society groups. These groups have expressed concerns about the government's economic policies and its handling of the country's industrial unrest.

Gerrymander in SA

The practice of gerrymandering in South Australia has been a source of controversy, with claims made that it unfairly benefits certain political parties. The issue has been particularly contentious in recent years, with the state government facing criticism for its methods of redistricting. The controversy has highlighted the importance of fair and transparent electoral processes in ensuring democratic representation.
