Commonwealth talks a failure: Muldoon

Commonwealth leaders were very considerably split, it seems, in their comments yesterday, after Dr. Ramaphosa of South Africa had said that he had found a way to break the deadlock in the Commonwealth meeting and had written a letter to the heads of the delegations. Dr. Ramaphosa said that he had approached the Commonwealth leaders to see if they could agree to a meeting and that he had written a letter to them. He also said that he had approached the Commonwealth leaders to see if they could agree to a meeting and that he had written a letter to them.

MELBOURNE: Australia has been asked to support an important meeting of leaders from different countries.

The Melbourne Declaration

This is the text of the “Melbourne Declaration,” issued by Heads of Government at the Commonwealth meeting yesterday:

We, the Heads of Government present, have agreed:

1. To work together to achieve a fairer, more equitable and sustainable world.

2. To address the global challenges facing our world, including climate change and poverty.

3. To promote respect for human rights and the rule of law.

4. To strengthen the role of the United Nations in global governance.

5. To promote dialogue and cooperation among all nations.

We commit ourselves to:

1. Working towards a world where all people enjoy peace and prosperity.

2. Fighting against poverty and hunger.

3. Promoting education and health care for all.

4. Protecting the environment and fighting climate change.

5. Strengthening the role of multilateral institutions in global governance.

We call on all countries to:

1. Support the efforts of the United Nations to address global challenges.

2. Work together to improve the lives of people worldwide.

3. Promote democratic values and respect for human rights.

4. Take bold steps to combat climate change and protect the environment.

5. Ensure that the voices of all people are heard in decisions that affect their lives.
