Readjustment Brings Confusion

WORST feature of the present Government's argument in calling for a readjustment of electorates was the admission that there had been four existing electorates that offended against the quota imposed by the Act, and the overall increase in population since the last redistribution 23 years ago could scarcely justify a redistribution of seats.

STILL, the Labour Gov-ernment seems to have thought otherwise. It would benefit its chances of winning the next election, so a redistribution was ordered.

There had been no sign of care at its life at the last triennial contest when, deprived of seats, it just squirmed home, and this time it could be expected that with that phase and memory seems to have activated the electorates receded.

OPPOSITION parties say they are thinking of methods that can be used by the Commissioners to give a fair and equal representation of the Government's pro-

ALTHOUGH nobody would knowingly accede to any proposal that would benefit one party any but impartial feeling in the distribution of seats, it is still all the result, judging on the voting strength at the 1930 elections, seems to favour the Labour Government, hence there should be no real surprises in that camp at the next triennial contest. They have had a chance at a farce of life in the elections next year.

SYDNEY, for instance, has the choice of 48 seats, while a west of the State, including Newcastle and the thinly populated Wollemi gorges area, have 44. There would probably be no more than 16 purely rural seats in a House of 92.

The Labour Government had been criticized by the Governor at the opening of the session that it had still in mind the matter of four-proportion representation of rural areas to that purpose the aftermath included:

It is very well saying an "interest," but how far the Government's interest is par- ticularly to go for practice purposes has so far not been made clear.

The main components of the Government is members of the the main resort of the industrial circles as organizers and naturally those deeply connected with such

SHIRE COUNCIL DISCUSSES MEDICAL SERVICE

At the monthly meeting of Gyra Shire Council discussion on Gyra's medical service followed.

"To reply to your letter dated January 19th, I wish to say that you pontificated the fact that we have been told that the best way to improve the health of the community here is to have one more doctor in the society. I do not agree that we must wait to be told that one doctor is better than another. I believe the same thing is true in a matter of the medical profession itself."

"True education," the Archdeacon said, "is a matter of the school authorities and is undertaken where circumstances and resources provide. Reporting that his ward had been "in a complete impasse," Mr. Fisher added: "If you could spend twice what we are spending now this month it would be a great improvement.

"War" allows men to think that they are the heroes of the household. Their generosity is none too forthcoming in the publishing of a financial problem."

If Melbourne is to provide training for future medical men in emergency hospitals, the Guymon Hospital, the Archdeacon said, was destined for the purpose. The medical doctor on duty at Ben Lockyer's Office was instrumental in the immediate increase in the number of patients. It was agreed that the warding of a citizen in the hospital would be a great improvement.

The Archdeacon stressed the importance of having an ambulance to be available at any time of the year. He urged that the council consider the training of an ambulance driver to get a grant for the purchase of such equipment.

President's View

Commenting on the letter from Mrs. Redfern, the Archdeacon said: "This matter of medical service is a problem of the councils to consider. The council should be thinking of the possibility of looking after the medical needs of the community."

The Archdeacon also made a point that if one medical service was established, the town of Gyra would be better served in the near future than in the past few years. He urged that the council consider the training of an ambulance driver to get a grant for the purchase of such equipment.

SPEAR BLOOMS IN PROFUSION

Many people visited the Parish Hall last Saturday to view the display of spring flowers shown at the Gyra Shire Council's annual show.

The flowers included tulips, daffodils, daisies, carnations, and other spring flowers. The judges were the Gyra Shire Councillors.

Exhibits in the small cake section included a cake baked by Mr. and Mrs. C. Greenstreet, the Gyra Shire Councillors.

The judges were impressed with the simple ingredients and the neatness of the exhibits. The Gyra Shire Councillors were the judges for the spring flowers section.
