DEPARTURE OF PRINCE ALFRED FROM SYDNEY.

In the extensive celebrations at the end of 1868 for the Prince's journey to Australia, a number of events were particularly significant. Among these was the ceremony at which the Prince was to depart from Sydney, bound for a tour of the continent. The preparations for the departure were extensive, with the finest vessels and the most elaborate arrangements being made to ensure a smooth and dignified exit. The Prince was greeted by a large crowd as he left the city, and the speeches and ceremonies that accompanied the event were a testament to the respect and admiration he commanded.

In her speech, the Prime Minister of New South Wales, Henry Parkes, emphasized the importance of the Prince's visit to Australia. She spoke of the Prince's role as a symbol of unity and friendship between the nations, and of the potential for his visit to strengthen the bonds of cooperation and mutual understanding. The Prince, in response, thanked the people of New South Wales for their warm welcome and expressed his hope that his journey would bring further benefits to the region. The atmosphere was one of optimism and anticipation, with the expectation that the Prince's visit would bring lasting benefits to the country.

The departure itself was a grand spectacle, with the Prince being transported to the ship in a state carriage, accompanied by a procession of dignitaries and officials. The vessel, H.M.S. Wingfield, was a fine example of naval architecture, and was well suited to accommodate the Prince and his entourage. The departure was marked by a series of dignified ceremonies, with speeches and cheers filling the air as the ship set sail. The Prince's departure was a momentous occasion, with the entire country looking forward to the events that would unfold during his tour of Australia.
