LY-ERM-OON.

SEVENTY-ONE LIVES LOST.

Early Monday morning intelligence reached Melbourne that the British steamer 'ERM-OON' of 700 tons, bound from Melbourne to Sydney, had been blown out of the Melbourne Road this morning, off the mouth of the Port Philip Heads, and had sunk. The ship was bound for Sydney with a cargo of flour and provisions, and on the 'ERM-OON' was the manager of the Grand Hotel of Sydney, with a wife and family. The steamer was seen to be in distress at 4 a.m., and the life-boat of the station was sent out, but the steamer could not be located before she sank. The life-boat was seen to have been peremptorily launched, but the crew did not live to be found. The life-boat was suffering severely from the roughness of the weather, and it was impossible to launch it, and she was only saved by a boat being thrown into the water by the crew. The ship was said to be in distress, and it was feared that she would have been lost.

A BRIGHT INTELLIGENCE.

The steamer 'ERM-OON' was bound for Sydney with a cargo of flour and provisions, and the manager of the Grand Hotel of Sydney was on board. The ship was seen to be in distress at 4 a.m., and the life-boat of the station was sent out, but the steamer could not be located before she sank. The ship was said to be in distress, and it was feared that she would have been lost.

A FANTASTIC STATEMENT.

The steamer 'ERM-OON' was bound for Sydney with a cargo of flour and provisions, and the manager of the Grand Hotel of Sydney was on board. The ship was seen to be in distress at 4 a.m., and the life-boat of the station was sent out, but the steamer could not be located before she sank. The ship was said to be in distress, and it was feared that she would have been lost.

LY-ERM-OON.

SEVENTY-ONE LIVES LOST.

Early Monday morning intelligence reached Melbourne that the British steamer 'ERM-OON' of 700 tons, bound from Melbourne to Sydney, had been blown out of the Melbourne Road this morning, off the mouth of the Port Philip Heads, and had sunk. The ship was bound for Sydney with a cargo of flour and provisions, and on the 'ERM-OON' was the manager of the Grand Hotel of Sydney, with a wife and family. The steamer was seen to be in distress at 4 a.m., and the life-boat of the station was sent out, but the steamer could not be located before she sank. The life-boat was seen to have been peremptorily launched, but the crew did not live to be found. The life-boat was suffering severely from the roughness of the weather, and it was impossible to launch it, and she was only saved by a boat being thrown into the water by the crew. The ship was said to be in distress, and it was feared that she would have been lost.

A BRIGHT INTELLIGENCE.

The steamer 'ERM-OON' was bound for Sydney with a cargo of flour and provisions, and the manager of the Grand Hotel of Sydney was on board. The ship was seen to be in distress at 4 a.m., and the life-boat of the station was sent out, but the steamer could not be located before she sank. The ship was said to be in distress, and it was feared that she would have been lost.

A FANTASTIC STATEMENT.

The steamer 'ERM-OON' was bound for Sydney with a cargo of flour and provisions, and the manager of the Grand Hotel of Sydney was on board. The ship was seen to be in distress at 4 a.m., and the life-boat of the station was sent out, but the steamer could not be located before she sank. The ship was said to be in distress, and it was feared that she would have been lost.