Wellington, May 8th.

Sroper the by that vide mons. Susan, should be memorials the from the policy in the Single marriage of the artilleryman, who was invested of the British empire and of the Order of St. John, was the first to be given in recognition of the services rendered by the Order in the war against the enemy. The recipient was a distinguished officer, who had rendered signal services in the field, and had been commissioned in the Royal Engineers. The ceremony was attended by a large number of military and civil officials, who paid tribute to the heroism and devotion of the recipient.

After the ceremony, the recipient was entertained at a banquet, during which speeches were delivered in his honor by various dignitaries. The speeches were highly complimentary, and the recipient was acknowledged as a hero of the war.

The next day, the recipient was presented with a large sum of money, which was intended to provide for his family in the event of his death. The presentation was made by a prominent member of the government, who expressed the hope that the heroism of the recipient would serve as an inspiration to others.

The recipient was then presented with a number of awards, including a gold watch, a set of silver plates, and a fine horse. The gifts were highly valued, and were intended to recognize the heroism and devotion of the recipient.

The recipient was then given a farewell ceremony, during which he was presented with a large sum of money, which was intended to provide for his family in the event of his death. The presentation was made by a prominent member of the government, who expressed the hope that the heroism of the recipient would serve as an inspiration to others.

The recipient was then presented with a number of awards, including a gold watch, a set of silver plates, and a fine horse. The gifts were highly valued, and were intended to recognize the heroism and devotion of the recipient.

The recipient was then given a farewell ceremony, during which he was presented with a large sum of money, which was intended to provide for his family in the event of his death. The presentation was made by a prominent member of the government, who expressed the hope that the heroism of the recipient would serve as an inspiration to others.

The recipient was then presented with a number of awards, including a gold watch, a set of silver plates, and a fine horse. The gifts were highly valued, and were intended to recognize the heroism and devotion of the recipient.