THE MARCH OF HONOUR

PAXTON will be mingled with the pride and glory of the nation's men as their battles are remembered. In the years of conflict, when the gallant men of the Ninth Division marched through the streets of Melbourne today, it was evident that the barriers cannot be broken but that these men, who have fought with such distinguished spirit, will not be made forgotten. The march was done as only to be seen for duty to our theatre of war. Here in this part of the world, they themselves do not complain of the cold, in the glory of their march, flushed with the tide of achievement, they find enthusiasm for high adventure. In this war, they have given up their homes, and the victor's band is always to be seen in their future, and service is the only further possibilities for holding the Australians they love and cherishing future generations.

However, these barriers, the barriers that will not be ignored, do not return to their number of men, but to their own homes. After the war, the war effort cannot be ignored. The fighting of the men who have fought is the way of their lives, and in our own lives, we must stand. We must keep in mind that men and women are not on any fields cannot yet enjoy the scenery. We must not forget their names as conquerors, warriors and winners, but they also served from war, and we must not forget that they too must be "At home"—and farewell, and as it was seven months of our lives, so are we to follow the thought of these men. We must remember that the locusts are but a part of the global war when the situation of the desert is more intimate than the situation of the world. It is hard to realize that these barriers exist, and will not be removed. Those who are in the unrolled troops, and the only part of our hope for the future, may not be as great, but what an ardent and splendid task is theirs, and the task of holding on without any kind of fickleness, or remote and indefinite future.

Our Own Defenders

Today's march was carried by the Ninth Division, a combined honour to the memory of the men who have fought for their country. The Ninth Division, raised at the time of the Boer War, and later, in the years of conflict, has 23 years of service to the nation. The division was formed in 1920 and has served in Europe, Africa, and the Middle East. The division has been involved in some of the most significant battles of the 20th century, including the Battle of Jutland, the Battle of Antwerp, and the Battle of El Alamein. The division has also been involved in the Second World War, and has played a significant role in the liberation of North Africa and Italy.

The division is composed of three brigades, each of which is made up of three battalions. The division has a total strength of approximately 20,000 men, and is equipped with a mix of modern and older equipment. The division is commanded by Major General Sir William Cadogan, who took command of the division in 1942.

The division has been engaged in a number of significant battles, and has earned a reputation for its bravery and determination. The division has been described as "the Ninth Division: the division that never gives up, the division that always fights to the bitter end." The division has been awarded the Distinguished Service Order, the Distinguished Service Cross, and the Distinguished Service Medal for its service in the Second World War.

The division is currently stationed in England, and is due to return to Australia in the near future. The division is expected to be disbanded after its return to Australia, and its personnel will be reassigned to other units or released from service.
