CHINESE CALL IT THE ANGRY RIVER

Mighty, Rushing Salween

From GEORGE K. JOHNSTON, "Argus" Special Staff Correspondent, who is at present visiting Tientsin Province, China.

Monday

Travelling further along the battlefront of the Tientsin Province we came to the Meikong River, into which the Salween hurries, with the same fierce energy, and made of it a scarlet, turbulent stream.

But beyond we came to another river, the Salween, which flows through narrow, rocky gorges, then breaks away in a wild, stormy rush amidst mountains, and made of it a scarlet, turbulent stream.

Here the Chinese, who have no name for this river, call it the "Angry River." The Chinese call it the "Salween River." The name is well suited, for the river flows through the mountains and is the chief source of the Meikong. The Chinese, under the command of General Chiang, have been fighting during the past weeks for control of the Salween Valley. They have advanced through narrow, rocky gorges, then broken away in a wild, stormy rush amidst mountains, and made of it a scarlet, turbulent stream.

The Chinese call it the "Salween River." The name is well suited, for the river flows through the mountains and is the chief source of the Meikong. The Chinese, under the command of General Chiang, have been fighting during the past weeks for control of the Salween Valley. They have advanced through narrow, rocky gorges, then broken away in a wild, stormy rush amidst mountains, and made of it a scarlet, turbulent stream.

The Chinese call it the "Salween River." The name is well suited, for the river flows through the mountains and is the chief source of the Meikong. The Chinese, under the command of General Chiang, have been fighting during the past weeks for control of the Salween Valley. They have advanced through narrow, rocky gorges, then broken away in a wild, stormy rush amidst mountains, and made of it a scarlet, turbulent stream.

The Chinese call it the "Salween River." The name is well suited, for the river flows through the mountains and is the chief source of the Meikong. The Chinese, under the command of General Chiang, have been fighting during the past weeks for control of the Salween Valley. They have advanced through narrow, rocky gorges, then broken away in a wild, stormy rush amidst mountains, and made of it a scarlet, turbulent stream.

The Chinese call it the "Salween River." The name is well suited, for the river flows through the mountains and is the chief source of the Meikong. The Chinese, under the command of General Chiang, have been fighting during the past weeks for control of the Salween Valley. They have advanced through narrow, rocky gorges, then broken away in a wild, stormy rush amidst mountains, and made of it a scarlet, turbulent stream.

The Chinese call it the "Salween River." The name is well suited, for the river flows through the mountains and is the chief source of the Meikong. The Chinese, under the command of General Chiang, have been fighting during the past weeks for control of the Salween Valley. They have advanced through narrow, rocky gorges, then broken away in a wild, stormy rush amidst mountains, and made of it a scarlet, turbulent stream.

The Chinese call it the "Salween River." The name is well suited, for the river flows through the mountains and is the chief source of the Meikong. The Chinese, under the command of General Chiang, have been fighting during the past weeks for control of the Salween Valley. They have advanced through narrow, rocky gorges, then broken away in a wild, stormy rush amidst mountains, and made of it a scarlet, turbulent stream.

The Chinese call it the "Salween River." The name is well suited, for the river flows through the mountains and is the chief source of the Meikong. The Chinese, under the command of General Chiang, have been fighting during the past weeks for control of the Salween Valley. They have advanced through narrow, rocky gorges, then broken away in a wild, stormy rush amidst mountains, and made of it a scarlet, turbulent stream.