Report Exonerates Dr. John Burton

The Espionage Royal Commission found that Dr. John W. Burton, former Secretary of the Department of External Affairs, was in no way responsible for leakage of information from the department.

The report said that Dr. Burton and his wife, who were interviewed separately, denied any involvement in espionage activities. The commission also found that there was no evidence to support the allegations made against Dr. Burton.

Dr. Burton said that he had never been involved in any espionage activities and that he had never engaged in any activities that could be interpreted as espionage.

The commission's report was based on a thorough investigation of the allegations against Dr. Burton and his wife, which included interviews with witnesses and the examination of documents.

The commission concluded that there was no evidence to support the allegations against Dr. Burton and his wife and that they had not engaged in any activities that could be interpreted as espionage.

The report also stated that the allegations against Dr. Burton and his wife were based on misinformation and that they had been unfairly prejudiced.

Dr. Burton said that he was pleased with the commission's report and that he had always been transparent in his dealings with the department.

The commission's report was received favorably by the public and the government, and it was widely considered to be a fair and impartial investigation.

The government announced that Dr. Burton would be reinstated to his former position and that he would receive a financial compensation for the time he had been unfairly prejudiced.

The report also stated that the commission had recommended that the government review its policies on espionage and that it should establish a new commission to investigate any future allegations of espionage.

The government announced that it would consider the commission's recommendations and that it would establish a new commission to investigate any future allegations of espionage.

The report was widely considered to be a fair and impartial investigation, and it was widely considered to be a significant step forward in the investigation of espionage activities in the Australian government.